On 17 May 2018, the Belgian platforms Be-cause health and Educaid.be jointly organise an international conference in Brussels on the intersection between health and education in international cooperation.

Better learning outcomes lead to improved health outcomes and vice versa. This is particularly true for women and girls. Ensuring quality education for all is central to the achievement of the Sustainable Development Goals, specifically the goals that ensure healthy lives and promote wellbeing for all, at all ages. At the same time, learning outcomes are also critically dependent on the health and nutrition of the individual learner.

But to what extent does international cooperation link health and education? Which examples of collaboration between the two sectors exist? What are the needs and principal barriers? What are the conditions for making collaboration effective?

This conference wants to highlight the links between health and education as global public goods, and explore common challenges as well as learning opportunities. It will thereby focus on investments in three main areas:

- Health workforce development
- Safe and healthy school environments
- Community engagement/awareness-raising for health and education

A keynote address will provide a 'helicopter view' of the intersection between health and education, followed by a panel of experts who will further highlight international priorities for this crucial interplay. In the afternoon, four parallel break-out sessions will focus on innovative practices and examples of collaboration between a wide range of development actors – international and Belgian – working on education and/or health.

The annual conferences of Be-cause health and Educaid.be aim to enrich discussion on respectively health and education issues within international cooperation by giving the floor to academics and researchers, policy makers and practitioners from all over the world. With this joint conference, both platforms aim to trigger critical reflection on the roles of international development actors in combining education and health.

The conference is organised with the support of the Belgian Ministry of Foreign Affairs/DG Development Cooperation and will take place in the Egmont Palace in Brussels. It will be held in English and French, simultaneous translation (English-French) will be provided in the plenary sessions and in one of the parallel sessions.
